Future of information systems design methodologies

by RICHARD VERYARD

Abstract: The evolution of information systems is no longer a novelty.

Two thirty-year-old studies critical management attention, how good the systems are, and how well they were planned. The study of information systems development is the methodology whereby we are built.

Three areas of general relevance in design methodologies are discussed: business strategy, system-type of program and organizational impact.

Keywords: design, processes, information technology, systems, design, methodologies, systems, information technology

Reality is a jungle. The traveller enters the jungle equipped with some technology (gun, compass, map) and the experience of previous travellers (maps, signposts). He travels from clearing to clearing, trying to keep going in the right general direction, while avoiding the many dangerous areas. He hopes to reach his goal, safely and quickly, whether he does will depend on the path he chooses. The most well-trodden path is not always the best.

A methodology is a path. Scientists and engineers use methodologies to direct themselves towards their goals. The goal of a designer of information systems is to implement an efficient, effective and reliable system. This paper is about the designer's own need for efficient, effective and reliable support, provided by a design methodology.

There are hundreds of formal methodologies in the computing literature. Most of them are of academic interest only. The concern here is with the design or to together with numerous minor variations on them that have been widely applied in industry, commerce and public administrations. This paper discusses what these methodologies provide today to the designer, and what improvements can be expected over the next few years.

What is a methodology?

The design and development of information systems is usually managed as a project, with a team of people working together over a period of weeks, months or even years. For the project to achieve its goals, it is necessary to assign responsibilities and tasks to the members of the team, and to ensure that their work is coordinated and coherent. There are two ways of doing this. One is to adopt the informal and intuitive methodology of tradition and common sense (TACS). The other is to follow the guidelines of a formal and systematic methodology. Such a methodology divides the system development process into a number of well-defined tasks, and provides techniques for carrying out these tasks. These techniques may involve a notation for documenting the stages of design and development, often in the form of diagrams, as well as step-by-step rules for completing the tasks.

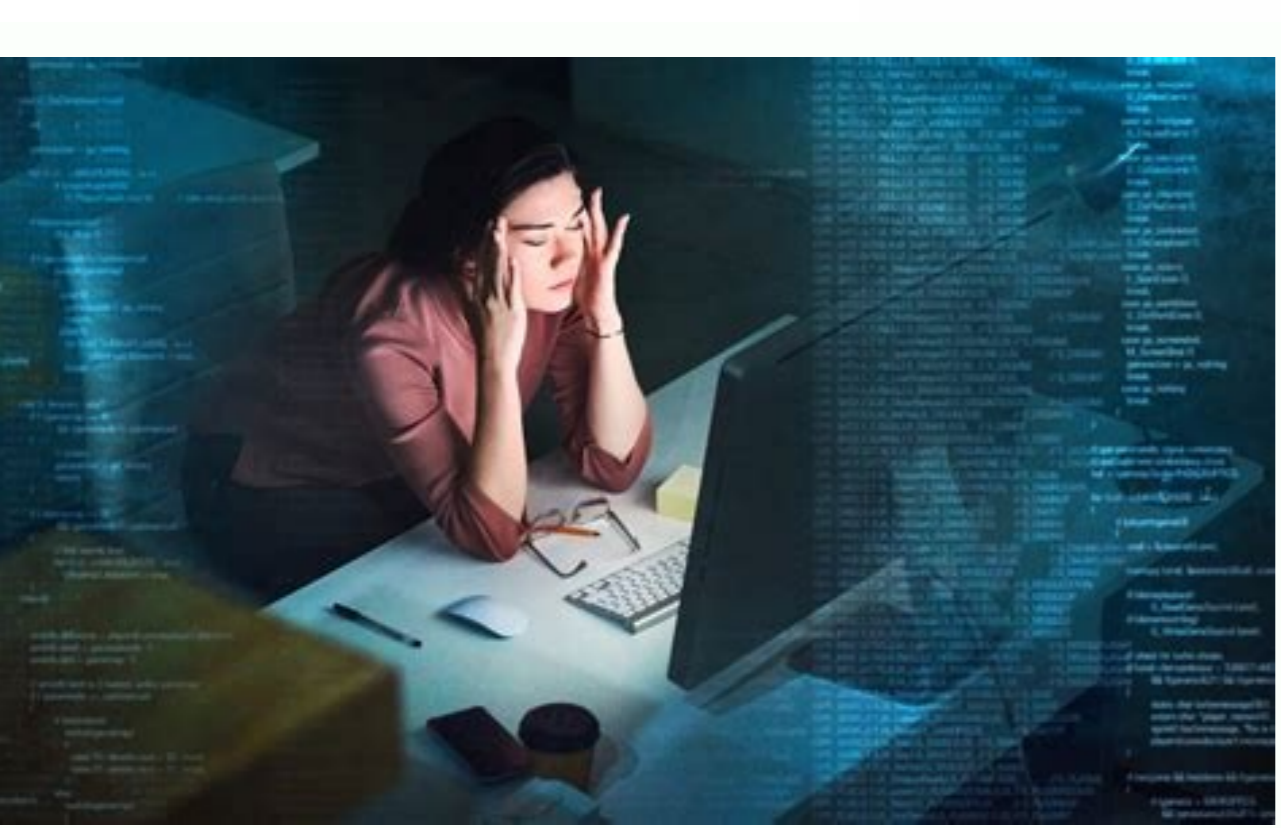

Methodologies actually work by making models of a situation, from which the system must not be derived. Methodologies differ in many ways, on the style adopted, in the skills and experience demanded from the individual designer following the methodology and above all, in focus. Table 1 shows some alternative foci to be found in popular design methodologies.

The main difference between TACS and a formal design methodology is that the latter is explicit, whereas the former is just kept in the heads of experts. There are several points to note here.

First, the formal methodology is teachable, whereas TACS is only learnt by making mistakes.
